Continuation of 11. does NOT place the application in condition for allowance because:

In response to applicant's argument that restriction is improper and should be removed. However, in an in person interview with applicant's representative on June 05, 2006, examiner was informed that the in the invention, modification to the core application is performed by the entity which has created the core application, whereas, independent restricted claim 30 recites the limitations of receiving a software application, branding said software application and forwarding software application to a user. This restricted claim clearly claims that a party other than entity can make modification to the core application. In view of the interview, applicant is claiming plurality of inventions, that is, restricting only entity that makes the core application to make modifications, and also, any entity can take any software application, modify it for distribution to users.

Therefore, restriction is proper because examiner will have to conduct plurality of searches, in this case, one where only an entity that created the application can make modification to the application for distribution, and, another search where any entity can take any application, make modification to the application and distribute it to the users.

In response to applicant's argument that claimed invention recites limitation "core portion of the electronic data includes a browser that retrieves and renders content" whereas, cited reference 1stUP.com is a small application.

However, applicant has claimed "core portion including a browser application" followed by the intended use of the browser. Overall, core portion combined with the browser is an application product of the entity which is modified to meet their client's requirements. As acknowledged by the applicant, cited reference 1stUP.com also teaches an application product, and, 1stUP teaches that their application can also be modified to meet their client's requirements
